(This was read at Jnana) (Then to be read somewhere on Dal Lake)

~~O Central Sun O!~~

~~Great Soma~~ Adonai!

~~Great Soma~~ Adonai

~~Great Soma~~

Take the four bodys, O ye ~~Lords~~. Each of ye take its own.

Earth to Earth; air to air;
Earth take thou earth; air take air; fire
fire; and water, water! Take Each his kind.

~~Great Soma~~

Gates of Splendor, swing ye open! Grant an abode of rest, Most Holy Lord!
If he be justified, then may his spirit See the Pleroma in its radiance

~~See O~~ Bright Adonai ~~Great~~ Soma; See he Thee he comes!

and expressed it most beautifully. Sir William Jones Thomas, according to Sanscrit Lexicographers opinion, "deeply imbued with the Oriental mysticism and transcendental religious views" speaking at length of the theosophic foundation of the Buddistic Maya, (universal illusion) gives one of the most poetical and truly felt description of the conception of the Buddists in these terms:

"The inextricable difficulties" says he "attending the vulgar notion of material substances concerning which we know this only, that we know nothing, and need many of the wisest among the ancients, and some of the most enlightened among the moderns, to believe that the whole creation was rather an energy than a work, by which the Infinite Being, who is present at all times and in all places, exhibits to the mind of His creatures a set of perceptions, like a wonderful picture or piece of music, always varied, yet always uniform; so that all bodies and their qualities exist, indeed, to every wise and useful purpose, but exist only as far as they are perceived — a theory no less pious than sublime, and as different from any principle of atheism as the brightest sunshine differs from the blackest midnight."
